A chair is not a chair is not a chair. Comfortable seats can provide a better experience—and uncomfortable seating equals unpleasant experiences, no matter how good the audio, video and other elements.

It's time to sit back, maybe put your feet up and enjoy a movie or your favorite show. But what to sit in? Home theater seating can be one of the most important but overlooked elements in your home entertainment space. Here are some tips to on what to look for when shopping for home theater chairs.

Before you shop, take measurements, know what width of seats you want—some companies offer several options—and check to see how much room you need for the seats to recline, if that is in your plans. Some seats can be coupled with shared armrests to build entire rows, even of big, comfortable recliners. You can even curve a row of seating, amphitheater style, with "wedge" units between the seats that allow more than one arm to rest—as well as a bowl of chips, perhaps.

Many types of seating, from traditional theater chairs to recliners and divans, are designed specifically for home theaters and media rooms and come in leather or the fabrics and colors of your choice. Many will also offer different grades of leather. Some companies even have hidden cup holders that pop out from the front of the seat or from beneath a sliding panel in the arm.

While a headrest can be a great for your head, it's not the optimal solution for your enjoyment of surround sound if speakers are to the sides or in back of you. Articulating headrests allow more neck and acoustic flexibility. Many reclining seats have motorized or manual controls for a range of positions.

A comfortable seat for two to three hours of viewing is essential to your home entertainment enjoyment.
